About Films, the Film Industry and Cinema Advertising

Just past 8pm on October, 30, 1938 Orson Welles delivered his famous deep-fake of the American public when CBS broadcast his radio adaptation of War of the Worlds. Based on the 1898 sci-fi novel by H.G. Wells, the main broadcast presented itself as a live report from New Jersey, where Martians had touched down to invade Earth. Some listeners mistook the broadcast as actual reporting on real events, prompting widespread panic. The next day, the 23-year old Welles spoke to reporters at a hastily arranged press-conference to explain that this outcome was entirely surprising and unintended. However, the attention also made Welles famous, establishing his reputation as a gifted storyteller with the skill to convince audiences to suspend their disbelief in the incredible, one of the fundamental propositions of Hollywood filmmaking.

“When they talked about that [Welles] was embarrassed by it, I don’t think so. . . . If you look at that press conference, he’s so contrite, and he’s just acting his brains out, and he’s so clearly delighted.”
- Director John Landis commenting on Welles speaking at the press conference after the 1938 broadcast.

IMAX Chief on ‘Tenet’, ‘Wonder Woman 1984’ and How the Company is Handling Coronavirus (Variety)

IMAX has fared best among global exhibitors during 2020, in large part based on the strength of their network in China and Japan, markets where audiences have returned to pre-pandemic levels of movie-going. Even in North America and Europe, where theatre attendance remains depressed, IMAX has produced industry-leading per-screen-averages based on their ability to provide big-screen experiences for blockbuster Hollywood fare such as Christopher Nolan’s Tenet. Variety interviewed IMAX CEO Rich Gelfond for an update on how the company is weathering the COVID-19, and to get his take on the reboot of exhibition globally, including the impact studios have had on the expected recovery by holding back on theatrical releases. Said Gelfond, “Had other movies [in addition to Tenet] come out soon afterwards, I think the industry would have been able to build back some momentum.” When asked about the return of audiences, he stated, “Moviegoing is going to rebound in a big way, just as it has in parts of the world where the virus is under control.”

How New York’s Small Cinemas Are Hanging On (New York Times)

Much of the attention on the plight of exhibitors has focused on large national chains and their struggles to navigate successfully through the challenges presented by the 2020 COVID-19 pandemic. However, 12% of the theatre locations in the US are operated by as small businesses and non-profits, responsible for either one or two small theatres. This article from the New York Times looks at efforts by NYC’s indie-cinemas to survive and stay relevant. Some can tap into the resources of deep-pocketed owners, while others are forced to rely on a patchwork of government relief programs, contributions from loyal supports from the community, and offering on-line “virtual” cinema screenings. One long-term advantage they may have is that they rely less than mainstream commercial theatres on the flow of blockbusters put out by Hollywood’s major studios. However resourceful they may be, the sudden collapse of revenues – which in many locations are down more than 85% from 2019 levels – presents extreme challenges for continued operation.

Over the last seven days, the leaders of all major European countries announced a second wave of lockdowns as a key element of public health measures to combat the recent spike in COVID-19 infections. On Sunday, Italian Prime Minister Giuseppe Conte announced that, regrettably, the government was requiring cinemas and other non-essential businesses to close their doors once again. On Wednesday, German Chancellor Angela Merkel announced a “lockdown lite” for Germany, scheduled to take effect on 11/2, affecting restaurants, bars, night clubs, cinemas and other theatrical and performance venues. On Friday, French President Emmanuel Macron made a similar announcement, with widespread closures that would leave only schools and daycares exempt. On Saturday, UK Prime Minister Boris Johnson announced the UK's upcoming forced closures. In all cases, the announcement was for a temporary closure, recognizing the economic and psychological burden they cause, with plans to reassess regularly the fundamentals that require these extreme measures.

With 'Mank', David Fincher Returns to the Best Director Oscars Race (Variety)

While the existential threat of the coronavirus pandemic looms large over the industry, it's important not to lose sight of the fact that Hollywood is still producing, and, in some cases, releasing (on-line) a steady flow of exceptional films. As November begins, the annual awards season is revving up to bring attention to some of the latest work. Last Thursday, Netflix provided its preview screening to critics of the upcoming drama Mank. Based on nearly unanimous enthusiastic response, the film appears likely to be considered for awards in many categories. One likely nom includes Best Director for David Fincher, whom many claim was robbed of a rightful win for The Social Network at 83rd Oscar Academy Awards in 2011. Amanda Seyfried is drawing attention as a possible dark horse candidate for Best Actress.

The Waiting Game: Is 2021 Ready For Its Close-up?

In Gower Street's first weekly article in Screendollars for 2020 (published Jan. 5) we predicted that the 12-month Domestic box office forecast would finish below 2019. This was in keeping with a general opinion across the industry, which saw many analysts suggesting the line-up of titles did not, on paper, look to offer the same level of appeal as those of last year, although our estimate, we argued, would likely be higher than many expected. In the article we included a caveat: "Of course, much can change over a 12-month period."

But no-one could have expected how much would change. No-one knew the devastation that would be reaped upon the global industry by the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic. With just two months left to run in 2020, Gower Street estimates now place the full year at just $2.55 billion – a far cry from the $11.1 billion estimate predicted in January. This will be the first time Domestic box office has fallen below $3 billion since 1983 ($2.75bn) and the lowest annual result recorded since 1981 ($918.3M).

With more titles exiting the calendar completely in favor of streaming options (including recent losses of Pixar's SOUL and Paramount's COMING 2 AMERICA) the media has been quick to, once again, claim the end is nigh for cinema as streaming accelerates to become the "next big thing". But the theatrical experience has survived many challenges before, adjusting to exist in parallel to television, VHS, DVD, gaming, etc. In 1981, when box office fell 45% year-on-year from 1980's $1.66 billion, the "scourge" of home video was the focus of blame and fear. The US imported 2.57 million VCRs from Japan in 1981 – becoming the biggest market for the, then, novel device. Hollywood has adjusted its output and filmmakers their approach time and again to make and maintain a vibrant theatrical offering.

Of course, the primary problem currently facing the industry is not as simple as alternate technology. Streaming platforms have been the de facto beneficiaries of the negative impact of the pandemic on movie theaters but the challenge represented by the streamers already existed and would have grown regardless, if perhaps at a slower rate. But the virus and the uncertainty it has spread has caused major studios to continually back-away from 2020 releasing. This has left smaller titles to try and fill the void. To paraphrase Gloria Swanson's character Norma Desmond in Billy Wilder's 1950 classic SUNSET BLVD (when cinemas and movie studios were beginning to face the challenge of television): "Cinema is big! It's the pictures that got small!"

The studios have, more-or-less, written this year off. But, like Norma Desmond, is 2021 now ready for its close-up?

With France and Germany the latest European majors, following Italy last week, to announce re-closures due to rising virus cases it seems likely more titles will delay again. In recent weeks we have started to see the first clear signs of Q1 nervousness. Sony's GHOSTBUSTERS: AFTERLIFE, having moved out of July this year to March 5, 2021, has now moved again to June 11; Paramount animation RUMBLE moved back from Jan. 29 to May 14, 2021 (having also originally been due out in July this year); even Aretha Franklin biopic RESPECT, which had looked like a potential major awards-season player, did not prove to be rock steady, with United Artists' shifting the film from Jan. 15 to Aug. 13.

In our Screendollars article of Sept. 21 we looked at the crush of titles already evident in the first quarter of 2021 with January seeing more wide-release titles dated than in 2019 or 2020; February on par with 2019 and March showing slightly more space. We have updated this graph for Q1 2021 below, however, despite the recent moves little overall has changed, with other titles having moved in.

Studios had previously appeared nervous to release into open and ready international markets while key parts of the Domestic market remained closed. Should they stay put in the calendar or retreat to a no-more certain later date? As British punk band The Clash sang in 1982, following that sub-$1 billion box office year in 1981: "If I go, there will be trouble. And if I stay it will be double." For the studios it was a catch-22. Go they did.

Whatever international box office potential there was for studio movies in July, August and, post-TENET, late-September and October has been lost. Now, as New York has started to re-open (with 25% of movie theaters by market share open in the state last weekend), key, lucrative European markets are re-closing. Latin America is still lagging behind EMEA and Asia Pacific markets in its first stages of recovery.

In 2019 over 60% of global grosses for top 100 Hollywood titles came from the international marketplace. Even without China (one of the few major markets currently operating strongly) that number would still be over 50%. If studios were unwilling to take a risk with a portion of the Domestic market unavailable, a minority share of the global box office potential on studio titles, it seems even less likely they would do so with Domestic opening but international once again retracting. This will present further challenges to the sustainability of many exhibitors and as the industry looks ahead to the oncoming winter with no more certainty Q1 2021 seems certain to witness further delays and abandonments. Independent films and distributors have found personal success filling the gaps in many markets and will likely continue to be relied on for sustenance. The theatrical experience will undoubtedly endure, as it has before, but studio releases may not be ready for their close-up for some time yet and challenges remain ahead.

The online version of this article also features the latest update of Gower Street's interactive visualization of the Domestic Release Calendar changes. It is available to view at: <https://gower.st>

Hollywood Report

by Martin Grove

With the leading circuits bleeding dollars as theatres remain shut in NYC & LA, there's speculation that studios or streamers should snap up the struggling chains. It seems to make sense initially.

After all, these companies all have very deep pockets and the distressed circuits certainly aren't in the best negotiating position. But do studios & streamers really need to own cinemas?

For studios, the answer seems to be "no." Buying one theatre circuit wouldn't provide the full national geographic reach to recreate pre-pandemic distribution patterns. A studio/exhibitor could add the missing markets by buying local indie theatres or partnering with another big circuit. Then it could establish its own window to play its films on its own streaming channel. But with exhibition so weakened now, shorter theatrical windows are already a safe bet.

Streamers, however, could play their big films – like Netflix's THE TRIAL OF THE CHICAGO 7 (pictured – Frank Langella) – using theatrical marketing to create awareness and quickly enhance their value for streaming. Not being in every big market wouldn't matter to streamers the way it would to studios.

Hollywood continues to pull the rug out from under exhibitors' feet with non-stop release schedule changes that show little concern for theatres' future.

Every case is different, of course, and a mid-pandemic delay that makes sense for a $200M+ Bond episode like NO TIME TO DIE doesn't seem equally logical for a less costly original bio-drama. So the news that MGM/UAR's RESPECT with Jennifer Hudson (pictured) as Aretha Franklin has been pushed to 8/13/21 is confusing.

The musical about the Queen of Soul was supposed to open wide 1/15/21 for the 4-day Martin Luther King Jr. Birthday weekend. This was such a relevant release date for RESPECT that it's hard to understand booting it to mid-August when moviegoers are more likely to be going to beach parties or barbecues. There's already speculation that a PVOD deal for RESPECT could be done long before 8/13.

But MLK weekend should still be a magnet for moviegoers. Universal/ FilmNation's female kick-ass spy thriller THE 355 will draw action audiences. Sony/MRC's animated PETER RABBIT 2 will be a family destination. WB/NL's action fantasy reboot MORTAL KOMBAT will draw mostly male video gamers.
