46 years ago on the Friday before Christmas in 1974, Paramount Pictures released The Godfather Part II in theatres across America. The film's release was eagerly anticipated both by the public and the industry, coming less than two years after the sensation Francis Ford Coppola had created with The Godfather. Part II is widely regarded as the best sequel in film history, perhaps even greater than the original. Both films won Academy Awards for Best Picture, remaining the only original/sequel combination to have done so. The second chapter in The Godfather saga came out at a time of transition for the film industry. In exhibition, single-screen movie theatres in downtown and main street locations were failing due to a general relocation of populations to the suburbs. They had not yet been replaced by the multi-screen Cineplexes which were just beginning to emerge, led by exhibitors such as AMC and General Cinema. In Hollywood, the traditional studio system was collapsing, with the fading appeal of tried and true genres such as Westerns and Musicals. Control of studios was being transferred from the aging movie moguls to corporate raiders such as Transamerica and Gulf + Western. Coppola emerged as a leader of a new generation of filmmakers and actors and actresses who created the films that pointed the way for the next 50 years of filmmaking.

How live music venues, theaters, and talent managers can get up to $10 million of $15 billion COVID relief grants — with no requirement to pay it back (Business Insider) Government financial assistance for beleaguered movie theatre operators is on the way. Funding for independent theatres that had been championed through the Save our Stages initiative was included in the $900B Coronavirus Response and Relief Act signed into law last Sunday evening by President Trump.

Within the package, a special allocation of $15B is earmarked for live performance venues, museums and motion picture theatres. Talent representatives and promoters may also qualify for these grants. Excluded from the program are large entities, including any publicly traded company or those operating internationally or in more than 10 US states. Details on the application process will be forthcoming quickly, since the intention for the program is to provide emergency financial relief to arts and entertainment venues which have been severely impacted by the COVID-19 pandemic.

Unlike with last spring's Paycheck Protection Program, the new aid will be provided as grants, rather than loans which can be forgiven if the recipient uses them for payroll expenses primarily. This restriction has been problematic for many theatres because the payroll needed to be paid during a period when many had been forced to remain closed by local health authorities.

'Wonder Woman 1984' Opening Boosts Movie
Theater Stocks, But AMC Loses More Ground – Update (Deadline)

Last weekend's encouraging box office results from the opening of Wonder Woman 1984 prompted an increase in the share prices for most public companies involved in exhibition. Shares in Cinemark, IMAX, Marcus and National CineMedia all rose at the prospect of a brighter 2021. AMC was a notable exception, with its shares wallowing at $2.38, with continued concern from investors about liquidity at the nation's largest exhibitor. The opening $16.9M weekend box office for Wonder Woman 1984 was better than results from any other film released during the pandemic, even with Warner Bros. also releasing the film at the same time for home viewing on HBO Max. Analyst Eric Wold from B Riley wrote, "We believe this helps support the thesis that when consumers are allowed back to theaters with attractive content, they will once again become moviegoers—with the industry having the potential to begin returning to normal in 2022."

Movie releases next year could make for an 'embarrassment of riches,' Imax CEO says (CNBC)

In an interview with CNBC last Monday, IMAX's CEO Rich Gelfond predicted a strong recovery in 2021 for his company and the film entertainment industry. 2020 was a brutal campaign for exhibition, stunned by the largest year-over-year declines in revenue and attendance in history. Gelfond's optimism is founded on three factors: (1) the near-term, widespread rollout of an effective COVID-19 vaccine, (2) a backlog of studio blockbusters scheduled to release in 2021, many of which were delayed from planned 2020 release dates and (3) the pent-up demand from consumers to emerge from lockdown and enjoy themselves once again by going to the movies. The Easter releases of the James Bond spy thriller No Time to Die and the animated family sequel Peter Rabbit 2 may herald the beginning of a significant recovery at the box office.

Comments from other Industry Leaders

- Disney's CEO Bob Chapek declared at the studio's 12/10 Investor Day presentations: "We had a $13 billion box office [in 2019], and that's not something to sneeze at. We built [our most valuable] franchises through the theatrical window."
- Universal's Vice Chairman Peter Levinsohn said, "We are very bullish on the prospects of the domestic box office once the cinemas are back up and running at full capacity; some level of exhibition consolidation is likely, but we believe ticket sales will be redistributed amongst the remaining theaters and have little impact on box office going forward."

THE EIGHT HUNDRED (Huayi Brothers) earned $440M in 2020 box office

It's Official: 2020 Domestic Box Office Fell 80 Percent to $2.3B Behind China's $2.7B

(Hollywood Reporter)

The impact of COVID-19 has been shared globally, bringing with it a steep decline in box office in every territory. Even in those territories which have done relatively well in managing the spread of the virus, the global studio releases have been choked off, limiting availability of the product that draws moviegoers to theatres. The North American box office came in at $2.3B, down a whopping 80% from the $11.4B generated in 2019. For the first time, the take for the Domestic market came in below that of China, which earned $2.7B in 2020, largely on the strength of local productions such as the patriotic WWII epic The Eight Hundred, which earned $440M. The Chinese market was only off by 70% from its 2019 level, a relative success in a very bad year.

Cannes Director Thierry Fremaux Marks 125th Anniversary of First Cinema Screening: 'Cinemas Died Often, Yet They're Still Alive' (Variety)

125 years ago, on 12/28/1895, the Lumiere Brothers conducted the first-ever commercial movie screening in Paris, using their camera/projector the cinematographe. To mark the anniversary, the director of the Cannes Film Festival Thierry Fremaux offered a guest column to Variety Magazine, looking back at the invention of movie going and forward to its post-pandemic future. The 125 year history of exhibition proves that going to the movies is fundamental to our nature, merging our desire to be entertained with our need to be social.

MARTIN GROVE'S Hollywood Report

With a strong slate of product heading to theatres in 2021, Wall Street should stop assuming streaming will kill exhibition.

Exhibition's demise has been predicted since the '50s. First it was TV, then cable TV & videocassettes & DVDs that would be the theatrical giant killer. Well, theatres survived, grosses mushroomed, and studios made tons of money from the new ancillary markets.

Streaming and theatres can show the same movies, but they meet different audience needs. In 2020 with few theatres open and nothing new playing, streaming was really the only game in town.

As vaccines roll out and theatres re-open, people will want to escape their homes and be with their friends. Moviegoing's a favorite way to do that. For years, sports fans have met friends at sports bars to watch games they could see at home on cable. But some days people want to get out and have fun and other days they just want to sit on their couch at home with a beer. People may have PVOD at home, but that doesn't mean they're ready to give up the shared experience of watching big movies like WONDER WOMAN 1984 (pictured) the way they were meant to be seen in theatres.
